JAN McNAMARA

Tēnā koutou katoa,

When I joined Woven Earth, I could never have imagined writing a message like this, one that marks the furnishing of our 1000th home.

This milestone reflects the collective strength of our community. It belongs to our dedicated and tireless team, our generous donors, our trusted partners, and the 84 referring agencies who walk alongside families every day. Most importantly, it belongs to the families themselves, who place their trust in us during some of the most vulnerable moments of their lives.

Woven Earth was founded on a simple but powerful belief: that families deserve dignity, practical care and a genuine pathway forward to rebuild their lives after violence.

What began as an idea has now grown into a fast-moving, deeply responsive organisation that meets challenge with action, and needs with unwavering commitment.

As demand has grown, so too have we. With growth has come a deepened commitment to accountability and excellence. Where once we operated with sheer determination and trust in what we were creating, we now have robust systems and governance in place and this includes our financial accountability. This reflects our responsibility to the community that stands behind us.

We're also proud to have more partnerships than ever before. This support enables us to furnish homes more fully, ensuring every home is tailored to the unique needs and dynamics of each family we support.

To walk into a Woven Earth home today is to see spaces filled with abundance, care, and a renewed sense of possibility.

Just as significant is the feedback we continue to receive from families and agencies alike. Time and again, we hear that our impact extends far beyond delivery day, creating lasting change that supports families as they rebuild and move forward.

Today, Woven Earth stands as a dynamic, purpose-led charity guided by strong leadership and community and driven by a single goal: to ensure every family has the foundation they need to rebuild, recover and thrive after domestic violence.

As Chair, I'm proud to lead Woven Earth, and thank you all for walking alongside us and the families we serve.

Jan McNamara
Chairperson

A word from Kerry, our founder and CEO

Dear friends, partners and supporters,

It is with immense pride and gratitude that I share our 2026 Annual Report. In this last year, we've reached a bittersweet milestone – delivering our 1,000th home and changing the lives of over 3,000 people.

While it's a significant milestone, it's also a sobering reminder of the ongoing impact of family violence in our communities. But behind each one of these numbers is a story of courage, hope and new beginnings. These stories are the heart of why we do what we do.

In the last year our charity has experienced significant growth. We have expanded our services, deepened relationships with referral agencies, and welcomed new partners who share our commitment to supporting families in crisis.

Central to everything we do is our incredible volunteer army. Day in and day out they show up, give their heart and soul, and bring practical skills, compassion and energy that are the lifeblood of Woven Earth.

They are the team that rallies when we need it most, and their commitment underpins our ability to respond quickly and go the extra mile to support each family.

Looking ahead, we are setting bold targets to carve out new ways of supporting families who have escaped family violence.

Our next focus is expanding our warehousing to bring our services under one roof. We've outgrown our current space, and it shows. Nearly seven years after I started Woven Earth, and after so much hard work and passion, that dream is finally taking shape, with a funder already on board to help us get there.

These steps are preparing us for the next 1,000 homes and beyond so more families can access the practical and essential support on their journey to rebuild their lives.

Woven Earth would not be possible without our community of donors, partners, volunteers and team. Thank you for believing in our mission, for sharing your time and resources, and for standing with the families we serve.

I'm excited for the year ahead, and how as a community, we will continue giving hope and dignity back to survivors who have chosen a life without violence.

This year's regular giving and funding at a glance

Every dollar donated through regular giving goes directly towards the cost of furnishing homes and lives.

This includes purchasing the brand-new essentials that make up around 40% of every home we furnish, as well as helping cover the costs of delivering furnished homes, including transport, logistics and the coordination needed to make it all happen. It also gives us the flexibility to respond to each family's unique circumstances by sourcing individual items that we know will support the person, or family's healing journey.

Did you know?

We receive no government funding or support, making every donor dollar vital to serving families rebuilding after violence.

Our overheads are covered by grants so that every regular giving dollar can go directly towards the cost of furnishing homes and lives.

As part of our commitment to improving the donor experience, we invited our regular supporters to share their feedback through an online survey.

Their responses were thoughtful, generous and incredibly valuable, helping us better strengthen our communications and supporter experience.

One comment that stayed with us was:

"I like it how every so often you say we need... and Briscoes have a sale on or whatever so that we know if we like giving things that they are the kinds of things you are looking for."

Acting on what we learnt, we made a number of improvements, including changes to our website:

- updating our Gift Items page to make it easier for donors to purchase the brand-new items we need most from recommended retailers and have them sent directly to our warehouse
- introducing a regularly updated list of the new and preloved items needed right now, to help respond to the tailored needs of the families we're furnishing.

We also heard that people wanted more stories from the families. In response, we introduced a regular feedback banner on our homepage.

One initiative we're especially proud of is the creation of a book of stories, celebrating the voices of the families whose lives have been touched by Woven Earth. More about this on page 17.

Our volunteer army, behind every home

Our regular team of 26 volunteers gifted over 25,000 hours to keep our mahi going

Often giving three days of their time every single week for donation sorting, packing for families and home set-ups.

On top of this, they also gather and sort gifted donor items from their own homes around Auckland.

They restore furniture, bake, grow plants, wash and mend donated goods, source and buy specific items from different stores to meet each family's tailored needs and requests. They also attend deceased estates that require extra care with sorting; and of course, they lovingly pack and load approximately four homes every week into our vans, ready for their special delivery to whānau.

Amongst our volunteer team is an energy and life force from a remarkable collective of people who give their heart and soul to Woven Earth and to every family we serve. Each one takes such pride and care in ensuring we pass on love and dignity through our service.

This year, we reached a milestone moment: furnishing Woven Earth's 1000th home

While reaching 1,000 homes was a significant milestone, what mattered most was the opportunity it created to shine a light on the people behind the number. Every home represents a family rebuilding after family violence – a journey of courage, resilience and hope.

To mark this moment, with funding and support from the Jenkins Foundation, we partnered with Wils & Co. Media to help share these stories. Together, we sought to raise awareness not only of our service, but also of the often, overlooked reality facing many survivors once they have found a permanent home.

Although emergency support exists for those leaving violent situations, the practical challenge of creating a home from nothing remains overwhelming.

Over several weeks, stories about Woven Earth appeared across television, radio, newspapers, magazines and online platforms, reaching an estimated audience of more than 1.7 million people throughout Aotearoa. Coverage included Seven Sharp, RNZ, Woman's Day, Sunday Star-Times, The Post, Capsule Magazine, and an opinion piece in the New Zealand Herald, which you can read on page 8.

What made this coverage particularly meaningful was the variety of stories that were told.

Some focused on the milestone itself, while others explored the wider issue of recovery after family violence, the importance of dignity, and the transformative impact of creating a warm, welcoming home.

The response from media outlets was overwhelmingly positive, reflecting a genuine appetite to hear stories that highlight both the challenges families face and the practical solutions that help them move forward.

Most importantly, the milestone allowed the voices of Woven Earth families to be heard. Their stories reminded New Zealanders that a furnished home is about far more than furniture. It is about restoring dignity, creating stability, and giving families the foundation they need to begin again.

With 1,000 homes reached, we remain mindful of the many more families still living with violence, still navigating the complexities of escaping safely.

These stories are the reason Woven Earth exists, and they continue to inspire everything we do.

Opinion by Kerry Thrupp

Published in the NZ Herald
10 April 2026

The gap after escaping domestic violence

We've become very good in New Zealand at telling people experiencing family violence to leave. It's a message reinforced through public awareness campaigns, workplace policies, and frontline services. And to be clear, this progress matters, more people are coming forward and finding the courage to step away from dangerous situations.

But there's a harder, quieter question we aren't asking loudly enough, and that's what happens next?

Because for many, leaving is not the end of the crisis, it's the beginning of another one. When families flee violence, they often leave with nothing. No furniture, beds, kitchenware or children's belongings. Safety comes first, as it must—but everything else is left behind.

But what follows is a reality we don't talk about enough, the overwhelming, immediate task of trying to rebuild a life from scratch. Family court expectations don't pause simply because someone has escaped harm. Parents are still required to demonstrate stability and the kind that comes with beds for children, a functioning home, and a sense of permanence. But without that, they risk losing care, despite having done the hardest imaginable thing – leave.

At the same time, financial support for these essentials is often limited, delayed, or offered in the form of debt. Some families can't access support at all, while others receive help that stretches to just the basics like a fridge, or a second-hand bed. But that falls far short of what's needed to create a livable, dignified space.

So we're left with a critical gap between escape and recovery, and that void is where many families falter.

The Salvation Army's State of the Nation report shows family violence remains at some of the highest levels since 2018. While more people are leaving, our systems are not equipped to support what comes after and without stability, the risk of returning to unsafe environments increases—not because people want to, but because the pathway forward is too fragile.

I'm a survivor of family violence and have experienced this first hand. I left with my two young children and began the long, complex journey of rebuilding. Despite having a strong professional background, I found myself navigating a system that could get us out, but not help us to start again.

This is the reality that led me to found Woven Earth and provide that missing piece.

We furnish empty houses for families who have fled violence, transforming them into homes. Not just functional spaces, but places that reflect the people living in them. We consider children's interests, family needs and personal touches, because recovery is not just physical, it's emotional and psychological. For a child who has lost everything familiar, a favourite toy or a bike can mean more than we realise and for a parent, a home that feels like theirs can be the foundation for healing.

Recently, we furnished our 1000th home in Auckland. It's a milestone we're proud of, but it's also confronting. It speaks to the scale of need and right now we're needed more than ever with 12 more homes to complete in the next two weeks alone.

But we're also one of the only organisations in New Zealand doing this work and we can't keep doing it alone.

Every week, we hear from agencies and communities across the country asking if we can help in their region and too often, we have to say no.

Meanwhile, families are spending months, sometimes years, in temporary or transitional housing without basic furnishings. We hear of homes with a single bed for a family of four, a table without chairs, a kettle, but no toaster and no bedding, towels or toys for children. These are not conditions that support recovery, they're holding patterns.

We also see systemic pressures that make rebuilding even harder, like families rushed into housing without time to prepare, a lack of support when children are returned to their care, and a one-size-fits-all approach to assistance that fails to reflect real lives.

If we're serious about breaking the cycle of family violence, we cannot stop at the point of escape, because safety without stability is fragile. We need to rethink how we support families after they leave. That means practical, accessible, dignified support that enables people to rebuild, not just survive. It means recognising that recovery is not a luxury or an add-on, it is central to long-term safety. Because if we don't close this gap, we risk undoing all the progress we've made and making our already bad statistics even worse.

Leaving should be the start of something better but right now, for too many families, it's just the beginning of another struggle.

Rebuilding better futures through our Children's Fund

Since launching in 2022, our Children's Fund has stood as a quiet but powerful commitment to the wellbeing of children whose lives have been shaped by family violence. They're the often, overlooked statistic in the family violence cycle; recognising and responding to the lifelong impact of this trauma remains at the heart of our service.

Through the Fund, we aim to restore more than safety; we seek to nurture dignity, identity and opportunity for the children within the families and homes we furnish. In doing this, our goal is to make sure that each child has the chance to explore their interests, develop their talents, and experience moments of joy that are so often disrupted by violence in the home.

This would not be possible without the generosity and vision of our supporters and we extend our sincere gratitude to our principal supporter the Lindsay Foundation, and the ANZ Staff Foundation for their continued support.

Their significant contributions enable us to go beyond meeting basic needs, and invest in the deeper aspirations of the children we support. Because of their funding, we're able to help children reconnect with their passions, build confidence, and imagine a future not defined by their past.

One young girl's story reflects the profound difference this support can make.

Having fled family violence with her mother and two siblings, she carried the heavy burden of severe trauma following abuse at the hands of her father. Like many children in similar circumstances, her world had become small and uncertain.

Yet within her was a powerful love for music, especially the piano. Through the kindness of a community donor, we were able to source a piano for her, and with support from the Children's Fund, arrange for it to be transported and delivered to her new home on the day we were doing their home set-up.

What may seem like a simple gesture became something much more. The piano represented not just an instrument, but a pathway to healing, self-expression and hope. She could reconnect with something that belonged entirely to her, something untouched by the violence she had endured.

Stories like this remind us why the Children's Fund matters. By investing in the lives of children, we're restoring a sense of possibility. We acknowledge their experiences, honour their resilience and stand alongside them as they begin rebuilding.

Together, with the ongoing support of our partners and community, we'll continue making sure every child like this young girl, has the opportunity to thrive, and not just survive.

Pictured right: Gifted by a generous donor, this piano helped one young girl reconnect with her passion for music and begin rebuilding after family violence

Our impact in their words

To mark the milestone of furnishing 1,000 homes in March 2026, we captured a selection of our whānau's feedback in a commemorative book "Stories from the Heart".

Since furnishing our first Woven Earth home in September 2019, we have been honoured to receive thousands of stories from the families we support. Some have been shared directly with us, while many have come through our agency partners, who have witnessed first-hand the profound impact a furnished home can have on a family's journey.

We invite you to download a copy from our website to read the stories from the people whose lives you've helped touch through Woven Earth

KERRYNN THRUPP

Our business product partners

Last year we shone the spotlight on our community partners. This year, we're proud to shine the spotlight on our business product partners whose dedicated support and generosity make sure every home furnished is to the highest standard.

"I was especially appreciative that many of the items I was gifted were brand-new."

AlSCO has been part of the Woven Earth journey since day one, and their ongoing support has been a true gift to the families we support.

Their generosity allows us to provide families with essential first aid kits, one of those items that can seem easy to overlook, but becomes incredibly important in the moment it is needed most. They have also generously supported our families through donations of quality ex-hotel linen, including sheets for cots, single beds, and queen beds.

AlSCO's heart for the community is exceptional, and we're incredibly grateful they chose to extend that same care and compassion to Woven Earth.

For over six years, BedsRus has stood with us in our Pillow Project, making sure every single person we support receives a brand-new pillow.

Thanks to their generosity and commitment, that's over 3,000 people who have tucked into bed with their own pillow. This partnership is about far more than products. It reflects BedsRus' unwavering belief in the importance of our work and the urgent need to support people affected by family violence. For someone leaving a harmful situation, the smallest details can make the biggest difference. A new pillow is more than an item, it's a clear message that says 'you matter'. They understand this deeply and their continued support helps us provide not only practical assistance, but moments of reassurance and kindness during life's most challenging transitions.

Together, we're giving every person we support the opportunity to rest, recover and rebuild, starting with a safe place to lay their head.

Our business product partners

C & F Creations exemplify what it means to be a family business with a big heart.

Their generosity reflects a deep understanding of the importance of community and giving back. Each mirror they create is a reflection of care and craftsmanship, but it also carries something far more meaningful. For every mirror sold, they donate $1 to support our work, helping us furnish more loving homes for survivors of family violence. This initiative is about more than financial support. A mirror may seem like a simple household item, but it plays a powerful role in helping someone reconnect with themselves and their sense of identity.

Through their support, we are able to elevate living spaces with their beautifully designed and crafted mirrors so that when families step into homes they see, reflected back at them, the strength and resilience they carry within.

A plant can brighten a room, soften a space and bring a sense of calm and care that turns a house into a home. It's why we're so excited to welcome Gellerts as our plant sponsor.

Our journey with plants began in the most community-driven way. One of our very first volunteers, Nic, started growing and gifting plants to us. It was a simple act of kindness that quickly became something much bigger. Soon after, Anouchka, another original volunteer, took this generosity to the next level. She dedicated an entire bedroom in her home to Woven Earth plants, nurturing and growing them so they could be gifted to our families. This journey of growing plants has mirrored the journey of growing our community. From small, heartfelt beginnings to a wide network of people coming together to provide a life-changing service. For the many families we support, these are the touches they ask for most. Plants represent life and growth, they help transform empty houses into living, breathing homes and spaces.. More recently, we've added fresh herbs alongside our house plants, thanks to a wonderful local man, Terry, whose passion for herbs has added another layer of care.

And now, with the support of Gellerts, we're able to make sure every home we furnish is filled with living plants. This partnership allows us to continue expanding the impact of something so simple, yet so meaningful.

This is more than just greenery. It's a story of community, generosity, and the belief that everyone deserves a home filled with life.

Our business product partners

Raven Products, five years of generous support

For over five years, Raven Products has been a valued and loyal supporter of Woven Earth, helping us provide families in need with essential household cleaning supplies. Their ongoing generosity has ensured we have a consistent supply of brooms, brushes, mops, toilet brushes, and kitchen scrubs for every home. This incredible partnership has translated into thousands of dollars' worth of donated products, making a meaningful difference for the families we assist. These everyday essentials are often items that can be overlooked, and yet they play an important role in helping families feel settled, supported, and empowered in their homes.

We are incredibly grateful to Raven Products for their continued commitment and for standing alongside us in our mission to support vulnerable families across our community.

We believe every family deserves dignity. And Weave believes it too.

For several years now, Weave has been showing up for our Woven Earth whānau as they rebuild their lives after escaping domestic violence, generously providing beautiful rugs and cushion covers for the homes we furnish. These thoughtful finishing touches do so much more than make a space look beautiful. They bring warmth, comfort and a sense of belonging – helping turn an empty house into a home that feels safe, welcoming and truly their own. Thanks to Weave's stunning, high-quality furnishings, we've been able to add that extra layer of love and care to hundreds of homes, creating spaces where families can settle in, take a breath and begin their next chapter.

Thank you Weave for continuing to stand alongside our whānau and for being such a valued part of our Woven Earth journey.

PROUD RECIPIENTS Meridian Energy

Meridian Energy is backing charities like ours to help reduce carbon emissions through the move to electric vehicles through their Decarbonisation Fund.

We're hugely grateful our application was successful, and this year we added a brand new Kia hybrid vehicle to our Woven Earth fleet.

Our funding grants

Woven Earth is powered by generosity: vital grants, donations, and partnerships that truly make a difference.

Every contribution comes from someone who believes in what we do and trusts us to use every dollar with care – a responsibility we take very seriously.
